In a situation where one cannot fully understand something, there will still be a certain degree of uncertainty, e.g. a specific fact, whether it is true or not. This is not the same as being confused. The term confused implies that there is zero understanding, whereas not understanding does imply a very specific level of understanding. What is the exact term to use for this? A: You might be interested in these terms: scrutiny (1) To subject something to close examination or careful research or discussion. scrutiny (2) The close examination, study, or discussion of something, especially by students or researchers. expertise (1) The knowledge or skill acquired by experience. expertise (2) A person with extensive specialized knowledge. students (1) The pupils or students of a school or college. students (2) The pupils of a teacher. See also the following dictionary definition for approximate synonyms: Level (of understanding) of an idea or a fact, as studied with an effort of clear thinking but not for the purpose of demonstration or proof. Thus understanding may be restricted and partial; also it is applied to matters of physical science and to some forms of literature. A: This is not a perfect word, since it may be used in the following way: He was asked to do some study for an exam. I wanted to help him, so I asked him how he was doing the study. He said he was doing great, because he was doing it by reading the textbook a couple times and it was really good. If you are trying to convey this feeling, there may be other ways to accomplish that.

He was doing some study for an exam. I wanted to help him, so I asked him what study method he was using. He said he was reading the textbook a couple times and it was great. I suggest he adopt the method of reading and learning. It's a system for acquiring knowledge, and it works. Rate
