identification
systems are well known. In many applications, an
electronic tag is

---

attached to an item to be identified. The tag may be a radio frequency identification (RFID) tag. Such systems are used in production and logistics, for example, to determine the inventory of items on a warehouse shelf or in a retail store. In such applications, the electronic tag may be attached to an item in a manufacturing or packaging process, and later read by a reader to determine the inventory status of the item. The electronic tag may be configured to store information, such as a serial number or a code identifying the source of the inventory. Typically, the electronic tag generates and transmits an

---

---

electromagnetic
signal at a
predetermined
frequency. A reader,
which may take one
of various forms,
detects the
electromagnetic
signal and decodes
the information
stored by the tag to recover the stored

data. The reader may also transmit data to the tag, thereby forming a two-way communication link between the tag and the reader. The individual tags may be used singly in item identification systems. However, the number of items on a given inventory or production line may be large, and each item on a line may need to be identified. In such cases, an electronic identification system including a plurality of tag readers may be used, with each

---

reader reading the
information from an
electronic tag
