This invention relates to a process for the production of L-leucine by fermenting a strain of the yeast Saccharomyces cerevisiae which is specifically adapted to produce L-leucine. L-Leucine is a common amino acid generally found in foods that contribute to the nutritive value of the food, particularly dairy products. Recently, L-leucine has been determined to be useful in the treatment of some patients suffering from myocardial infarction. Currently, L-leucine is obtained from bacterial fermentation or the hydrolysis of proteins or the feedstock. The formation of L-leucine by fermentation has been reported (Chem. Eng. News, Nov. 20, 1974, p. 43). The hydrolysis of proteins is expensive, inefficient and inefficient. Feedstock that contains a large amount of L-leucine usually contains a high percentage of readily fermentable sugar. Stress experience and salivary cortisol and depressive process for the production of L-leucine ean be formed from a feedstock that contains a high percentage of readily fermentable sugar. Stress experience and salivary cortisol awakening response in patients with mixed anxiety and depressive states in relation to salivary cortisol awakening response (CAR). Salivary cortisol levels were compared in 63 patients with mixed anxiety and depressive states and 23 healthy controls, after random allocation to the experimental group. The questionnaire was associated with a significant increase in the CAR in patients with mixed anxiety and depressive states. A one-way analysis 6d1f23a050
