The Baghdad government has announced the dissolution of the Kurdistan Region's governing body – Kurdistan Democratic Party (KDP) – but it is still too early to say whether the decision will bring about a crisis and an escalation. The announcement of the dissolution on the government's Facebook page was accompanied by videos, social media links, videos, and posts, all in Amara. There has been no voice of protest from the federal government's spokesman or President Barham Salih, and local reaction has been muted. Some even believe this may be a government move meant to ease tension with Turkey. But it is clear that the central government is taking the big step, the dissolution of a power that has been strangling the country for a decade. The Kurdish regional government will remain in place, even though it has virtually no representation in Baghdad. It will be important to see how this plays out in the coming days. There are no new powers At any rate, this is not new. The regional government was dissolved in 2003 and reinstated in 2005 after protests by the Shia community and the demand for autonomy from the central government. In that case, the government lost its power in the regional capital Arbil in April of 2005. The government then fled to Irbil. The current situation is different, not least because today's decision is unprecedented. The government did not declare the dissolution of the parliament, the government of the Kurdistan Region, or the regional government. The dissolution of a particular member of parliament does not necessarily mean the dissolution of the parliament. But the government did announce that the regional parliament should be dissolved and "some" seats should be allocated to alternative parties, not previously declared. That in itself could be political. The KDP has always had significant influence on the Kurds in Baghdad. But it now controls most of the seats in the regional parliament. This means that it will win most of the seats in a by-election to the regional parliament. This was not the strategy of the government. The government can have other goals: de-democratising the regional parliament and limiting the influence of the KDP there. If so, the government would have to give some kind of explanation and justification to the parliament before it would be dissolved. This can cause political pressure. But it can also take care of this by giving the parliament five days to dissolve the parliament. Possible impact The impact of the dissolution will be the big question. Some are concerned that this is an attack on the Kurdish people and the region. There is a feeling of a "defenestration" of the Kurds, with no clear strategy. There is also concern that an ethnic group is being expelled from their homeland. The Kurds have a very fragmented situation, and there is a large Kurdish diaspora, making this a sensitive and emotional issue. 5ec8ef588b
