In fibromyalgia syndrome, pain is a prevalent clinical condition along with widespread tenderness. Vasoconstriction of blood vessels may contribute to the syndrome through decreased blood flow to subcutaneous tissues. Venlafaxine is a serotonin and norepinephrine reuptake inhibitor that has been reported to have a peripheral vasoconstrictor effect that is not attributable to serotonin. The aim of this investigation was to evaluate the effects of venlafaxine on pain and tenderness in patients with fibromyalgia syndrome. In a 12-week randomized, double-blind, placebo-controlled, parallel-group study, 33 patients were treated with either venlafaxine (37.5-225 mg/day) or placebo in addition to treatment they were receiving as usual. Assessments included the Fibromyalgia Impact Questionnaire (FIQ), Brief Pain Inventory (BPI), Short Form-36 Health Status Questionnaire, Performance Anxiety Scale (PAS), and FIQ subscales. There were no significant differences between venlafaxine and placebo. There was a statistically significant improvement in the BPI-Short Form pain interference, in the FIQ global score, in the FIQ pain index, and in the FIQ physical functioning, general health, vitality, and role limitations due to physical health scores. In this group of patients, venlafaxine did not improve the symptoms of pain and tenderness in the context of treatment of fibromyalgia syndrome.
