Obviously, there are a lot of features in Photoshop that aren't ready for Mobile just yet, and likely will never be. That doesn't mean they're not worth thinking about, though: the Mobile influence in the software's evolution does suggest a pretty good chance that some of these features will eventually land there as well. I would certainly put Photoshop Mobile into consideration for image editing on the iPad Pro, particularly if you have the old hardware, a lot of images, and no real budget for a conventional standalone model. Of course, if you're looking for a full-featured desktop-style app, you have a better option that will likely carry you much further. But it seems like it'd be harder to get some features to work well on a smaller-screened device, and I have to ask: why would you ever want that? After the release of ACR 6.0, I was ready to switch to Lightroom. I settled on it for my new camera and this year was planning a project we would do together in the summer. Lightroom 5.0 and and it's brute power utilized it's full potential. But when I tried Lightroom 5.1 on an ipad, I was shocked and saddened that the performance was nothing better than ACR. I bought a 4th gen ipad and tried it again. Same story. If you are on late and you wish to get into light room without waiting it can be quite disheartening. ACR is still worth the price, it's still the best app for photo editing IMO. But light room is soo much better. In the end I am grateful for this app, I'm thankful for the CPU and GPU horsepower I am wasting right now. If this situation changes light room will not have my business. Thank you and Adolph.

Google first developed WebAssembly to give developers access to executing compiled languages in the browser with a subset of the features provided by native applications. Without WebAssembly, Photoshop couldn't be brought to the web due to its reliance on a Windows-only runtime. However, by leveraging WebAssembly, Photoshop is now able to run on any browser using the WebAssembly and JavaScript ecosystems. Dynamic languages can now be used to interact with Photoshop through client-side JavaScript to implement custom functionality. In addition, the community and users of Photoshop have been using WebAssembly to extend the reach of the program in future. Our The Power of Learning Groups have been using WebAssembly to improve design, create art, create videos, and other forms of content.
