According to the Release Notes, "After installing the free Lightroom Cloud Expanded edition (5.4.1) software, the Lightroom 4 Catalog, Collections, and Media Library contents will be added to the connected account." It appears that the Lightroom 5 cloud feature adds new content to the Lightroom 5 catalog. I have the same Lightroom Cloud catalog on other computers. When I connect the new Lightroom 5 on the new computer, the catalog appears with additional content, but I see no additional space on any of my other computers. This somewhat contradicts the above listing, so I'm a bit cautious about using the Lightroom Cloud feature to share images with employees and collaborators. I've always used Dropbox, and it's always worked well. In the past, I had scanned images as jpg or bmp files into the computer's local hard drive and shared them with my colleagues. This worked fine because each image was stored in its own folder and could be accessed as needed. Lightroom is considerably more robust in Lightroom 5. When you are finished, I urge you to add keywords and tags to your images immediately after you've imported them. If you work with clients who need to gain access to your images, you can grant them access to your catalog, or any of your collections, and share the collections with them. There is no need to keep your images for a week or two before cataloging them. Lightroom 5 supports a free online version of Adobe Stock. If you work in a creative industry and need a steady flow of images from photographers whose work you want to license, this is a definite plus. If you already own Lightroom 4, it should have a version that is compatible with the above feature. If not, it is highly recommended that you purchase Lightroom 5 and use the free version of Lightroom Cloud at the same time.
