I was a little surprised by a couple of things about this update. The most noticeable is that you can either drag one of the new upper tool panel booms over to the side of your screen or you can open it up by holding your finger over it for either left or right-hand side. After installation, I noticed that the older versions of ( here ) don't immediately give you a warning about needing an internet connection when you start the program and so the dialog box with that message didn't pop up.

The biggest (and I'll admit somewhat surprising) new addition to the program is that it contains its own web browser. This allows you to go to any URL you want directly from within Photoshop. Like the rest of the interface, Photoshop's web browser offers some unique features that give it an edge over other web browsers. When in (image) editing mode, Photoshop will use the contents of the images that you're working on as the web page's content (if you're viewing a site from before the beta update, file a bug if you think you've observed this too). You can then use the edges of pages to slide things back into Photoshop. If you open another web browser (or even switch to another tab on the same browser window), the page will lose its connection to the original and be presented with a dialog warning that it's insecure, requesting that you authorize subsequent connections (or just open the URL directly in your browser). Both the new camera shortcut and the high-res monitor option now appear only if your camera has a resolution higher than 1080p. Otherwise, that option has gone away, as has the command that put your iPad display into compact monitor mode. After the update, you can now use the camera shortcut to take a photo or record video even if you have it set to "On" in the camera's settings, instead of having to open the camera in order to initiate this action. Use the camera shortcut to quickly record 720p or 1080p video on a device that isn't connected to Adobe Photography software, which will use much less space on the storage card. There's no longer a high-res monitor option, though since this was, it's hard to imagine that many people used it.

The idea of running software as complex as Photoshop directly in the browser would have been hard to imagine just a few years ago. However, by using various new web technologies, Adobe has now brought a public beta of Photoshop to the web. Why Photoshop came to the web For the web, Photoshop was one of the first software products built to take full advantage of the web technologies being created for the browser. Adobe Photoshop CC's access to Adobe's Code.org and Microsoft's Chakra JavaScript engine cut the time developers spent optimizing Photoshop from two years to three weeks. A key workhorse for designers, photographers, and illustrators, Photoshop has long been the de facto standard for photo editing. Yet it's not only a large and powerful application, but also a complicated one, with more functionality than even the most complex browser can natively provide. This made running it in the browser a challenge. In 2010 as we began working on the Portable Document Format (PDF), we began discussing some of the limitations of the existing browsers used on the web. One of the key limitations was that no browser had large enough interfaces to Photoshop. Flickr co-founder Stewart Butterfield actually challenged us at that meeting, saying, "Why not use the native capabilities of the browser to allow me to edit photos?" At Adobe, we love how the web enables innovation, so we started sketching out what we could do. We started with a new web markup language, WebAssembly, to build the Photoshop application inside the browser. It proved to be a compelling combination of hardware acceleration, powerful graphics rendering and a simple, efficient memory model. e3d0a04c9c
